from

The Odyssey

An Epic Poem by Homer

Translated by Robert Fitzgerald

PART TWO: from Books 10–12

"The lovely voices in ardor appealing over the water made me crave to listen, and I tried to say 'Untie me!' to the crew, jerking my brows."

THE ENCHANTRESS CIRCE (from Book 10)

After escaping the Cyclopes' island, Odysseus and his men land on the island of Aeolus (ē′ ə ləs), king of the winds. Aeolus assists him by putting all of the unfavorable winds in a bag, which he gives to Odysseus. His curious crew, however, rip open the bag, and the hurricane-like winds blow the ships far off course. In the days that follow, Odysseus and his men fight a battle with cannibals on Laestrygonia (les trig ō′ nē ə), in which they lose many men and all but one of their ships. Odysseus and his remaining men then arrive on the island of the goddess and sorceress Circe (sʉr′ sē). Though his men are fearful of what they may find there, Odysseus sends out a scouting party.

"In the wild wood they found an open glade around a smooth stone house—the hall of Circe—and wolves and mountain lions lay there, mild in her soft spell, fed on her drug of evil.
None would attack—oh, it was strange, I tell you—but switching their long tails they faced our men like hounds, who look up when their master comes with tidbits for them—as he will—from table.
Humbly those wolves and lions with mighty paws fawned on our men—who met their yellow eyes and feared them.
In the entrance way they stayed to listen there: inside her quiet house they heard the goddess Circe.
Low she sang
in her beguiling voice, while on her loom she wove ambrosial fabric sheer and bright, by that craft known to the goddesses of heaven.
No one would speak, until Polites—most faithful and likable of my officers, said:

'Dear friends, no need for stealth: here's a young weaver singing a pretty song to set the air a-tingle on these lawns and paven courts.
Goddess she is, or lady. Shall we greet her?'

So reassured, they all cried out together, and she came swiftly to the shining doors to call them in. All but Eurylochus—who feared a snare—the innocents went after her.
On thrones she seated them, and lounging chairs, while she prepared a meal of cheese and barley and amber honey mixed with Pramnian wine, adding her own vile pinch, to make them lose desire or thought of our dear father land.
Scarce had they drunk when she flew after them with her long stick and shut them in a pigsty—be • guil • ing (bi gī′ liŋ) adj., outwardly charming but inwardly deceptive stealth (stelth) n., sneakiness; secretiveness bodies, voices, heads, and bristles, all swinish now, though minds were still unchanged.

So, squealing, in they went. And Circe tossed them acorns, mast, and cornel berries—fodder for hogs who rut and slumber on the earth.
Down to the ship Eurylochus came running to cry alarm, foul magic doomed his men![1] But working with dry lips to speak a word he could not, being so shaken; blinding tears welled in his eyes; foreboding filled his heart.
When we were frantic questioning him, at last we heard the tale: our friends were gone. . . ."

Odysseus leaves the ship at once to confront Circe himself. Protected from her spells with help from Hermes, Odysseus convinces the goddess to restore his shipmates to their human form. Odysseus and his crew dally on Circe's island for a year. When Odysseus decides they must head home, Circe tells him he will not return safely unless he goes to the Land of the Dead to seek advice from the blind seer Teiresias.

---

1. magic doomed his men. Crew members enslaved by Circe's tricks